Diphenhydramine decreases regional cerebral blood flow in patients with occlusive cerebrovascular disease. In an effort to examine the possibility that histamine and H1-receptor mechanisms are involved in cerebrovascular hemodynamics, we have measured regional cerebral blood flow (rCBF) in seven patients with cerebral infarction after intravenous injection of diphenhydramine (DPH) (50 mg), a H1-receptor antagonist. Reregional cerebral blood flow was measured by the stable xenon inhalation technique. At baseline, mean transit time (MTT) was 1.32 ± 0.22 s in the ipsilateral hemisphere, 1.16 ± 0.25 s in the contralateral hemisphere, and 1.37 ± 0.35 s in the frontal cortex. Mean transit time was not significantly affected by DPH. In contrast, rCBF was decreased to the frontal cortex and the ipsilateral hemisphere in all patients after administration of DPH. The time to maximum reduction in rCBF was 31 ± 10 min. The decrease in rCBF in the frontal cortex after DPH was highly correlated with the reduction in MTT at that site (P less than .001). However, the decrease in rCBF in the ipsilateral hemisphere after DPH was not significantly correlated with the MTT at that site. Thus, these results indicate that DPH may decrease CBF in the ipsilateral hemisphere by an H1-receptor mechanism.

Mesenchymal stem cells in articular cartilage: age and gender related effects on differentiation. Most studies on the use of mesenchymal stem cells in articular cartilage have used young donors and have focused on male donors. In this study, we examined the effects of age and gender on the ability of bone marrow-derived mesenchymal stem cells (BMMSC) to differentiate into chondrocytes. BMMSC were isolated from 15 donors, divided into three age groups (24-28, 39
