I think a critical step for Go to become ubiquitous is for more developers and companies to use it. You are going to find it incredibly hard to change industry to use a language that nobody uses or has heard of. I do think Go can succeed in the production use of systems programming, as most of the world has moved to systems programming. For me, the real reason to use Go is because of the standard library. For me that's the killer feature, if you are not going to use the standard library I will not use Go
